

Lady Jane Grey.
 Jane Grey was the most learned of which history has any record. She was nine years old when she was a beautiful hand and was play on many different instruments. She could speak several languages both ancient and modern, being well grounded in philosophy. When other children were playing, she would amuse herself by reading the philosopher Plato in Greek. Perhaps it was because she had a very lonely life when she was a child, as her mother was often away at court, that she was in the care of her governess and her schoolmasters at the family place called Bradgate. The house was built on the edge of a great forest surrounded by a high wall and not any newspapers, books and not any newspapers, and Lady Jane Grey had playmates, as her governess would not allow her to play with the children, and there were no other children for her companions.

The Origin of Windfall.
 The origin of the expression "windfall" is used when one wishes to a streak of good luck, dates to the time of William the Conqueror. At that time it was a criminal to cut timber in the British forest without royal consent. All that was gathered for fuel or other uses was such limbs as the wind happened to break and cast to the ground. On this account the peasants called a great windstorm as a blessing because it was apt to cast enough "windfalls" for winter firewood. This old time forestry custom is the modern application of the expression. At one time it was decreed that such limbs and whole trees should fall during the three summer months could be used as firewood, but plainness of the act was so plain that no attempt was ever made to enforce it.
